

Feds sue registrar in O.C. to access records

The U.S. Department of Justice seeks details about noncitizens taken off voter rolls.

BY SALVADOR HERNANDEZ AND LAURA J. NELSON

Federal authorities sued Orange County's top elections official, alleging the county registrar violated federal law by refusing to disclose detailed information about people who were removed from the voter rolls because they were not citizens.

The lawsuit, filed in federal court, alleges that Orange County Registrar Bob Page is "concealing the unlawful registration of ineligible, non-citizen voters" by withholding sensitive personal information such as Social Security and driver's license numbers.

The 10-page lawsuit does not allege that any noncitizens voted in Orange County.

"Voting by noncitizens is a federal crime," said Harmeet Dhillon, the assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division. "States and counties that refuse to disclose all requested voter information are in violation of well-established federal elections laws."

The lawsuit Wednesday stems from a June 2 letter from the Justice Department to Orange County election officials, seeking information on people who had been removed from the county's voter rolls because they weren't eligible to vote. According to the lawsuit, federal officials were acting on a complaint made by the relative of a noncitizen who received a mail-in ballot.

Over a five-year period, Orange County identified 17 noncitizens who had registered to vote, Page told the federal agency in a June 18 letter, sent in response to the June 2 request. Those people either "self-reported"

[See Noncitizens, A6]

JASON ARMOND Los Angeles Times

JULIE LEOPOLD For The Times

PASTOR Carlos Rincon, clockwise from top, and wife Amapro livestream a service. Robb Smith of Alley Cat Deliveries says some people are afraid to leave their home. Doña Chela now rarely goes anywhere.

LUKE JOHNSON Los Angeles Times

Immigrants go dark or online

WASHINGTON — An undocumented man from Guatemala who has leukemia postponed chemotherapy because he was afraid to go to the hospital.

A Mexican grandmother packed most of her belongings into boxes, in case she is deported.

A Pentecostal church in East Los Angeles has lost nearly half of its in-person membership.

Across California and the U.S., immigrants are responding to the Trump administration's unrelenting enforcement raids by going into lockdown. Activities that were once a regular or even mundane part of life

Some access class, services, church virtually to avoid ICE. Others fear doing that too.

By Andrea Castillo and Queenie Wong

— taking kids to school, buying groceries, driving — have become daunting as immigrants who lack legal authorization grapple with how to avoid arrest and deportation.

To stay safe, some immigrants have swapped in-person activities with digital approximations. Others are simply shutting themselves away from society.

"It's a harmful form of racial profiling combined with the suspension of constitutional rights and due process. That's why many families are staying at home," said Victor Narro, a professor and project director for the UCLA Labor [See Hidden, A6]

Troubling deployment for some

Some Guardsmen and families are agonizing over the operations in L.A., advocates say.

BY HAILEY BRANSON-POTTS AND PHI DO

Ever since President Trump seized control of the California National Guard and deployed thousands of troops to Los Angeles, calls from distressed service members and their families have been pouring in to the GI Rights Hotline.

CARLIN STIEHL Los Angeles Times

A MARINE stands guard outside the Wilshire Federal Building in Los Angeles on Monday.

Some National Guard troops and their loved ones have called to say they were agonizing over the legality of the deployment, which is being litigated in federal court, according to Steve Woolford, a resource counselor for the hotline, which provides confidential counseling for service members.

Others phoned in to say the Guard should play no part in federal immigration raids and that they worried about immigrant family members who might get swept up.

"They don't want to deport their uncle or their wife [See Troops, A7]

Measles cases in 2025 top all of 2024

California's increase coincides with largest recent U.S. outbreak of infectious disease.

BY RONG-GONG LIN II

California has already reported more measles cases this year than in all of 2024, a worrisome development that comes as the nation is suffering its largest outbreak of the super-infectious disease in decades.

The extent of the national outbreak has rocked measles from a back-of-mind issue — one rarely, if ever, encountered by a whole generation of Americans — to a pressing public health concern.

"Measles is completely preventable," Dr. Elizabeth Hudson, regional chief of infectious diseases at Kaiser Permanente Southern California, told The Times.

The uptick in confirmed measles cases in California, while still somewhat concerning for local public health officials, pales compared with the significant outbreak that began in Texas earlier this year and has since spread to surrounding states.

Texas has reported at least 750 measles cases; New Mexico, 81; Kansas, 80; North Dakota, 28; and Montana, 23, according to the respective states' health departments. Michigan has reported 15 cases; Ohio and Illinois, 10, and Arkansas and Indiana, eight.

The virus is spreading almost universally among people who either haven't been vaccinated, or whose vaccination status is not known, authorities note. But the MMR shots, so named because they also afford protection against mumps and rubella, have long been in the crosshairs of anti-vaccine activists and skeptics — some of whom are now in charge of shaping U.S. policy regarding childhood immunizations.

There have been 17 cases [See Measles, A14]

Justices rule Medicaid can exclude Planned Parenthood

BY DAVID G. SAVAGE

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court ruled Thursday that states may exclude Planned Parenthood clinics from providing medical screenings and other healthcare for women on Medicaid.

The court's conservative majority cast aside the long-standing rule that said fied provider.

In a 6-3 vote, the justices ruled the Medicaid Act does not give patients an "individual right" to the provider of their choice.

The dispute turned on abortion, even though federal funds cannot be used for the procedure.

Medicaid is funded by federal government states. For decades not want to ing provide But federal mos M

Readers: If you have questions, please contact the Los Angeles Times at (213) 343-4444 or latimes.com. We will do our best to answer your questions.

Immigrants go inside, online to avoid ICE Vet adv

[Hidden, from A1]
Center.

Pastor Carlos Rincon, who leads the Pentecostal church in East Los Angeles, said about 400 people used to attend his church every week, people with roots in Guatemala, Mexico, El Salvador and Honduras. Now, half as many attend and viewership of livestreamed services on Facebook and YouTube has increased. Some prayer groups meet on Zoom.

In January, the Trump administration said immigration agents were free to make arrests in sensitive locations once considered off limits, such as hospitals, schools and churches.

At Rincon's church — which he asked not be named for concern about retaliation — fear has colored life in ways large and small.

A congregant in his late 20s who has leukemia postponed his chemotherapy, afraid he could be caught and deported to Guatemala. After he decided to reschedule the treatment, church leaders agreed they will take turns staying with him at the hospital.

A half-day program to provide resources for landscapers and a music class for children were canceled this month after many said they were too afraid to attend. Rincon restarted the music class last week for those who could attend.

On Wednesday, after neighbors told him that immigration agents had been lurking around the area, he warned families against attending a regularly scheduled in-person church service.

Five miles away at Our Lady of Lourdes Church, Father Ricardo Gonzalez said attendance is down at least 30%. The church doesn't livestream Mass, though he's considering it.

Gonzalez said parishioners expect him to have answers, but as an immigrant green card holder himself, he too doesn't know how to react if immigration agents show up at the church.

"If I get arrested, am I going to be thrown from the country?" he said. "Who is going to help me out?"

For weeks, agents have been arresting those who show up at courthouses for their immigration proceedings.

Volunteers at USC, UCLA, UC Irvine and UC Law San Francisco responded by establishing a free hotline to help people file motions to move their appointments online. The service was the idea of Olu Orange, a lawyer and USC political science and international relations professor who runs the Agents of Change Civil Rights Advocacy Initiative.

DOÑA CHELA has packed up her clothes, pots and pans, and jewelry just in case ICE agents come for her.

PASTOR Carlos Rincon now livestreams his service from his East L.A. church.

Since the hotline ([888] 462-5211) went live June 15, volunteers have responded to nearly 4,000 calls and helped more than 300 people fill out the form to move their hearings online.

On Friday, Orange answered a call from a girl who sounded about 12 years old, whose parent had been picked up by immigration agents.

"She saw this number on social media and she called and she said, 'What can I do?'" Orange said. He gave her the number for the Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights of Los Angeles.

Luz Gallegos, executive director of TODEC Legal Center in the Inland Empire, said the pandemic prepared some rural and elderly residents for the current reality because it taught people to use technology — "to go virtual." Now they have Wi-Fi and know how to use Zoom.

Some, though, also fear staying digitally connected.

Gallegos said many people who call TODEC's hotline say they are changing phone companies because they are afraid of being tracked by immigration agents. Others say they're swapping cellphones for pagers.

Many of the immigrants served by TODEC now leave their homes only for work, Gallegos said. They have groceries delivered or run to the store when they think border agents are least likely to be on patrol. Before schools let out for the summer, some parents switched their children to online classes.

Some Inland Empire farmworkers now won't grab their mail from community mailboxes, Gallegos said, so TODEC has mobilized volunteers to drop off mail, give people rides and help with interpretation needs.

One person helped by the nonprofit is Doña Chela, an undocumented 66-year-old woman who asked to be identified by her nickname.

Many months ago, Doña Chela packed up her possessions after making plans to return to her hometown in Michoacan, Mexico, for the first time since she arrived in the U.S. in 1999. But in April, her brother called to say it wasn't safe there, that cartel groups had taken over the neighborhood and were extorting residents.

Her husband, a U.S. citizen, has dementia. She thought of moving instead to a border town such as Mexicali, where she and her husband could still be near their three adult U.S.-born daughters.

But then her husband's condition began to decline, and now starting over feels too difficult. Even so, she has chosen to keep her clothes, pots and pans, and jewelry packed away — just in case.

Doña Chela doesn't leave her home except for emergencies. Her daughters bring her groceries because she has stopped driving. She no longer goes to church or makes big batches of tamales for community reunions. She barely sleeps, thinking that agents could burst through her door any time.

"I don't know what to do anymore," she said, crying. "I will wait here until they kick me out."

Her only distraction from constant anxiety is the lush garden she tends to daily, with mangoes, nopales, limes and a variety of herbs.

Gallegos, of TODEC, said the situation faced by Doña Chela and so many others bring to mind a song by Los Tigres del Norte: "La Jaula de Oro." The golden cage.

"Our community is in a golden cage," she said. "I hope it's not too late when this country realizes they need our immigrant work force to sustain our economy."

St. John's Community Health, one of the largest nonprofit community healthcare providers in Los Angeles County that caters to low-income and working-class residents, launched a home visitation program after it surveyed patients and found many canceling appointments "solely due to fear of being apprehended by ICE."

The clinic, which serves L.A., the Inland Empire and the Coachella Valley, said that since the immigration raids began, more than a third of all patients didn't show up or canceled their appointments.

Some of those who canceled signed up for telehealth or home visits performed by a small team of medical staff, said Jim Mangia, the clinic's chief executive. The clinic is adding another home visitation team to double the amount of visits they perform.

Community coalitions are stepping in to help immigrants who can't afford to hide. OC Rapid Response Network, for instance, raised enough funds through payment app Venmo to send 14 street vendors home.

Robb Smith, who runs Alley Cat Deliveries, said he has seen requests for grocery deliveries grow by about 25%.

He doesn't ask his customers whether they're immigrants in hiding, but there are signs that people are afraid to leave their house. One woman, who said she was making an inquiry for a friend, asked him whether he saw any ICE officers when he was picking up items at Costco.

Glen Curado, the founder and chief executive of World Harvest Food Bank in Los Angeles, said there has been a significant drop in people coming in to pick up groceries in person. Up to 100 families visit the food bank on a weekday, down from the usual high of 150, he said.

The food bank has a program, Cart With a Heart, in which people can donate $50 toward fresh produce, protein and other staples to feed two families for a week. The donors can then take those groceries to people sheltering in place.

"It's almost like a war scene," Curado said. "You hide here. I'll go out and I'll get it for you, and I'll bring it back — that mentality."

Castillo reported from Washington and Wong from San Francisco. Times staff writer Melissa Gomez in Los Angeles contributed to this report.

[Troops, from A1] or their brother-in-law," Woolford said. "Some of the language people have used is: 'I joined to defend my country, and that's really important to me — but No. 1 is family, and this is actually a threat to my family.'"

Although active-duty troops are largely restricted from publicly commenting on their orders, veterans' advocates who are in direct contact with troops and their families say they are deeply concerned about the morale of the roughly 4,100 National Guard members and 700 U.S. Marines deployed to Los Angeles amid protests against immigration raids.

In interviews with The Times, spokespeople for six veterans' advocacy organizations said many troops were troubled by the assignment, which they viewed as overtly political and as pitting them against fellow Americans.

Advocates also said they worry about the domestic deployment's potential effects on military retention and recruitment, which recently rebounded after several years in which various branches failed to meet recruiting goals.

"What we're hearing from our families is: 'This is not what we signed up for,'" said Brandi Jones, organizing director for the Secure Families Initiative, a nonprofit that advocates for military spouses, children and veterans. "Our families are very concerned about morale."

Janessa Goldbeck, a U.S. Marine Corps veteran and chief executive of the nonprofit Vet Voice Foundation, said that, among the former Marine Corps colleagues she has spoken to in recent weeks, "There's been a universal expression of, 'This is an unnecessary deployment given the operational situation.'"

"The fact that the LAPD and local elected officials repeatedly said deploying the National Guard and active-duty Marines would be escalatory or inflammatory and the president of the United States chose to ignore that and deploy them anyway puts the young men and women in uniform in an unnecessarily political position," she said.

She added that the "young men and women who raised their right hand to serve their country" did "not sign up to police their own neighbors."

...

Trump has repeatedly said Los Angeles would be "burning to the ground" if he had not sent troops to help quell the protests.

"We saved Los Angeles by having the military go in," Trump told reporters last week. "And the second night was much better. The third night was nothing much. And the fourth night, nobody bothered even coming."

The troops in Los Angeles do not have the authority to arrest protesters and were deployed only to defend federal functions, property and personnel, according to the military's U.S. Northern Command.

Justice Department sues for O.C. registrar records

[Noncitizens, from A1] that they were not citizens or were deemed ineligible by the Orange County district attorney's office, Page said.

The registrar sent the names, dates of birth and addresses of those 17 people to federal officials, but redacted some sensitive information, including Social Security numbers, driver's license numbers, voter identification numbers and scans of their signatures, according to a letter from the county's lawyers.

County lawyers argued that withholding more sensitive personal information mation about noncitizens who registered to vote.

Justin Levitt, an election law expert at Loyola Marymount University's law school and a former voting rights lawyer in the Justice Department, said the lawsuit was "a little weird," in part because government agencies frequently negotiate over sharing information and rarely go to court to do so.

The Justice Department should be able to verify whether Orange County has a process of ensuring that ineligible people are kept off the voter rolls by seeing the not citizens.

The district attorney's office found that one person had registered to vote despite not being a citizen. That person, a Canadian citizen and legal resident, pleaded guilty in 2024 to three misdemeanor counts of casting votes in the primary and general 2016 elections. He was sentenced to one year of informal probation.

Bob Page did not return messages seeking comment about the suit. A spokesperson for the registrar's office said the county does not

Medica

[Justices, from A1] jority.

The court's three liberal all women, dissented.

ICE Vet advocates worry about troops in L.A.

It's not too late when this country realizes they need our immigrant workforce to sustain our economy."

St. John's Community Health, one of the largest nonprofit community healthcare providers in Los Angeles County that caters to low-income and working-class residents, launched a home visitation program after surveying patients and many canceling appointments "solely due to fear of being apprehended by ICE."

The clinic, which serves the Inland Empire and Coachella Valley, said since the immigration raids began, more than a third of all patients didn't show up or canceled their appointments.

Some of those who canceled signed up for telephone or home visits performed by a small team of bilingual staff, said Jim Manly, the clinic's chief executive. The clinic is adding another home visitation team to make the amount of visits possible.

Community coalitions are stepping in to help immigrants who can't afford to pay for OC Rapid Response services, for instance, because of a lack of enough funds to send 14 street vendors home.

Bob Smith, who runs that Deliveries, said he has seen requests for groceries grow by 15%.

Smith doesn't ask his customers whether they're immigrants in hiding, but there are signs that people are leaving their homes. A woman, who said she was making an inquiry for a job, asked him whether any ICE officers were picking up items at Curado, the founder of executive of World Food Bank in Los Angeles, said there has been a significant drop in people coming to pick up groceries. Up to 100 families from the food bank on a typical day, down from a high of 150, he said.

Curado said that the food bank has a program called "With a Heart, in a Flash," where people can donate $50 to get fresh produce, protein staples to feed a family for a week. The program then takes those items to people sheltered.

"It's almost like a war zone," Curado said. "You have to go out and I'll bring it back to mentality."

Curado said that the food bank has a program called "With a Heart, in a Flash," where people can donate $50 to get fresh produce, protein staples to feed a family for a week. The program then takes those items to people sheltered.

Curado said that the food bank has a program called "With a Heart, in a Flash," where people can donate $50 to get fresh produce, protein staples to feed a family for a week. The program then takes those items to people sheltered.

Curado said that the food bank has a program called "With a Heart, in a Flash," where people can donate $50 to get fresh produce, protein staples to feed a family for a week. The program then takes those items to people sheltered.

Curado said that the food bank has a program called "With a Heart, in a Flash," where people can donate $50 to get fresh produce, protein staples to feed a family for a week. The program then takes those items to people sheltered.

Curado said that the food bank has a program called "With a Heart, in a Flash," where people can donate $50 to get fresh produce, protein staples to feed a family for a week. The program then takes those items to people sheltered.

Curado said that the food bank has a program called "With a Heart, in a Flash," where people can donate $50 to get fresh produce, protein staples to feed a family for a week. The program then takes those items to people sheltered.

Curado said that the food bank has a program called "With a Heart, in a Flash," where people can donate $50 to get fresh produce, protein staples to feed a family for a week. The program then takes those items to people sheltered.

Curado said that the food bank has a program called "With a Heart, in a Flash," where people can donate $50 to get fresh produce, protein staples to feed a family for a week. The program then takes those items to people sheltered.

Curado said that the food bank has a program called "With a Heart, in a Flash," where people can donate $50 to get fresh produce, protein staples to feed a family for a week. The program then takes those items to people sheltered.

Curado said that the food bank has a program called "With a Heart, in a Flash," where people can donate $50 to get fresh produce, protein staples to feed a family for a week. The program then takes those items to people sheltered.

[Troops, from A1] or their brother-in-law," Woolford said. "Some of the language people have used is: 'I joined to defend my country, and that's really important to me — but No. 1 is family, and this is actually a threat to my family.'"

Although active-duty troops are largely restricted from publicly commenting on their orders, veterans' advocates who are in direct contact with troops and their families say they are deeply concerned about the morale of the roughly 4,100 National Guard members and 700 U.S. Marines deployed to Los Angeles amid protests against immigration raids.

In interviews with The Times, spokespeople for six veterans' advocacy organizations said many troops were troubled by the assignment, which they viewed as overtly political and as pitting them against fellow Americans.

Advocates also said they worry about the domestic deployment's potential effects on military retention and recruitment, which recently rebounded after several years in which various branches failed to meet recruiting goals.

"What we're hearing from our families is: 'This is not what we signed up for,'" said Brandi Jones, organizing director for the Secure Families Initiative, a nonprofit that advocates for military spouses, children and veterans. "Our families are very concerned about morale."

Janessa Goldbeck, a U.S. Marine Corps veteran and chief executive of the nonprofit Vet Voice Foundation, said that, among the former Marine Corps colleagues she has spoken to in recent weeks, "There's been a universal expression of, 'This is an unnecessary deployment given the operational situation.'"

"The fact that the LAPD and local elected officials repeatedly said deploying the National Guard and active-duty Marines would be escalatory or inflammatory and the president of the United States chose to ignore that and deploy them anyway puts the young men and women in uniform in an unnecessarily political position," she said.

She added that the "young men and women who raised their right hand to serve their country" did "not sign up to police their own neighbors."

Trump has repeatedly said Los Angeles would be "burning to the ground" if he had not sent troops to help quell the protests.

"We saved Los Angeles by having the military go in," Trump told reporters last week. "And the second night was much better. The third night was nothing much. And the fourth night, nobody bothered even coming."

The troops in Los Angeles do not have the authority to arrest protesters and were deployed only to defend federal functions, property and personnel, according to the military's U.S. Northern Command.

GENARO MOLINA Los Angeles Times

U.S. MARINES guard the downtown L.A. federal building while people, reflected, participate in a prayer walk for family unity on June 18.

Task Force 51, the military's designation of the Los Angeles forces, said in an email Saturday that "while we cannot speak for the individual experience of each service member, the general assessment of morale by leadership is positive."

The personnel's "quality of life," the statement said, is "addressed through the continued improvement of living facilities, balanced work-rest cycles, and access to chaplains, licensed clinical social workers, and behavioral health experts."

It is unclear whether the National Guard troops, federalized under Title 10 of the United States Code, had been paid as of last weekend. Task Force 51 told The Times on Saturday that the members who received 60-day activation orders on June 7 "will start receiving pay by end of the month" and that "those that have financial concerns have access to resources such as Army Emergency Relief," a nonprofit charitable organization.

U.S. Rep. Derek Tran (D-Orange), an Army veteran and member of the House Armed Services Committee, said he has asked Defense Secretary Pete Hegseth "for his plan to manage the logistics of this military activation, but he has failed to provide me with any clear answers."

Tran said in a statement to The Times that "the pattern of disrespect this Administration has shown our Veterans and active-duty military personnel is disgraceful, and I absolutely think it will negatively impact our ability to attract and retain the troops that keep America's military capacity the envy of the world."

Diana Crofts-Pelayo, a spokeswoman for Gov. Gavin Newsom, said in an email that the governor is "worried how this mission will impact the physical and emotional well-being of the soldiers deployed unnecessarily to Los Angeles."

On June 9, Newsom posted photos on X depicting National Guard members crowded together, sleeping on concrete floors and what appeared to be a loading dock. He wrote that the president sent troops "without fuel, food, water or a place to sleep."

Task Force 51 told The Times that the troops in the photos "were not actively on mission, so they were taking time to rest." At the time, the statement continued, "it was deemed too dangerous for them to travel to better accommodations."

Since then, according to Task Force 51, the military has contracted "for sleeping tents, latrines, showers, hand-washing stations, hot meals for breakfast, dinner and a late-night meal, and full laundry service."

"Most of the contracts have been fulfilled at this time," the military said.

Abigail Jackson, a White House spokeswoman, said in a statement to The Times that Newsom "should apologize for using out-of-context photos of National Guardsmen to try and make a political argument."

"Under President Trump's leadership military morale is sky high because our troops know they finally have a patriotic Commander-In-Chief who will always have their backs," Jackson wrote.

Troops have been posted outside federal buildings in an increasingly quiet downtown Civic Center — a few square blocks within the 500-square-mile city.

Their interactions with the public are far different from those earlier this year, when Newsom deployed the National Guard to L.A. County to help with wildfire recovery efforts after the Eaton and Palisades fires.

At burn zone checkpoints, National Guard members were often spotted chatting with locals, some of whom brought food and water and thanked them for keeping looters away.

But downtown, troops have stood stone-faced behind riot shields as furious protesters have flipped them off, sworn at them and questioned their integrity.

During the boisterous "No Kings" protests on June 14, a woman held up a mirror to troops outside the downtown Federal Building with the words: "This is not your job. It's YOUR LEGACY." On a quiet Wednesday morning, a UCLA professor, standing solo outside the Federal Building, held up a sign to half a dozen Guard members reading: "It's Called the Constitution You F—."

James M. Branum, an attorney who works with the Military Law Task Force of the National Lawyers Guild, said that, in recent weeks, the task force has received two to three times more than the usual volume of referrals and direct calls. The upward trend began after Trump came into office, with people calling about the war in Gaza and increased military deployment to the U.S. southern border — but calls spiked after troops were sent to Los Angeles, he said.

"A lot of these folks joined because they want to fight who they see as the terrorists," Branum said. "They want to fight enemies of the United States ... they never envisioned they would be deployed to the streets of the United States."

In his June 7 memo federalizing the National Guard, Trump called for their deployment in places where protests against federal immigration enforcement were occurring or "are likely to occur." The memo does not specify Los Angeles or California.

California officials have sued the president over the deployment, arguing in a federal complaint that the Trump administration's directives are "phrased in an ambiguous manner and suggest potential misuse of the federalized National Guard."

"Guardsmen across the country are on high alert, [thinking] that they could be pulled into this," said Goldbeck, with the Vet Voice Foundation.

Jones, with the Secure Families Initiative, said military families "are very nervous in this moment."

"They are so unprepared for what's happening, and they're very afraid to speak publicly," she said.

Jones said she had been communicating with the wife of one National Guard member who said she had recently suffered a stroke. The woman said her husband had been on Family and Medical Leave Act leave from his civilian job to care for her. The woman said his leave was not recognized by the military for the domestic assignment. He was deployed to Los Angeles, and she has been struggling to find a caregiver, Jones said.

Jones said her own husband, an active-duty Marine, deployed to Iraq in 2004 with the 2nd Battalion, 7th Marine Regiment based at Twentynine Palms — the same infantry unit now mustered in Los Angeles.

The unit was hard hit in Afghanistan in 2008, with at least 20 Marines killed and its high rate of suicide after that year's deployment highly publicized.

Jones said she was stunned to learn the battalion — nicknamed the War Dogs — was being deployed to Los Angeles.

"I said, 'Wait, it's 2/7 they're sending in? The War Dogs? Releasing them on Los Angeles?' It was nuts for me," Jones said. "To hear that unit affiliated with this — for my family that's been serving for two decades, it brings up a lot."

The Los Angeles deployment comes at a time of year when the California National Guard is often engaged in wildfire suppression operations — a coincidence that has raised concerns among some officials.

On June 18, Capt. Rasheedah Bilal was activated by the California National Guard and assigned to Sacramento, where she is backfilling in an operational role for Joint Task Force Rattlesnake, a National Guard firefighting unit that is now understaffed because roughly half its members are deployed to Los Angeles.

"That's a large amount to pull off that mission ... so you have to activate additional Guardsmen to cover on those missions," said Bilal, speaking in her capacity as executive director of the nonprofit National Guard Assn. of California.

National Guard members are primarily part-time troops, who hold civilian jobs or attend college until called into active duty. In California — a state prone to wildfires, earthquakes and floods — they get called into duty a lot, she said.

Many of the service members in downtown Los Angeles are the same ones who just finished a 120-day activation for wildfire recovery, she said.

"You have the state response to fire and then federal activation? It becomes a strain," Bilal said.

"They haven't complained," she added. "Soldiers vote with their feet. We're mostly quiet professionals and take a lot of pride in our job. [But] you can only squeeze so much of a lemon before it is dry. You can only pound on the California Guardsmen without it affecting things like retention and recruiting."

Medicaid patients can't pick provider, court says

[Justices, from A1] jority.

The court's three liberals, all women, dissented.

Justice Ketanji Brown

ment conservative and a Reagan appointee.

But the court agreed to hear the state's appeal in Medina vs. Planned Parentstate laws that ban hormone treatment for transgender teens.

Carol Tobias, president of the National Right to Life of murals, Kobe tribute is tagged

GENARO MOLINA Los Angeles Times

MORIAL to Kobe and Gigi Bryant in L.A. was vandalized twice. "There's just a lot of meaning at that wall," artist Sloe Motions said.

rs her business has housed on Main Street. fore, it was isolated to ated areas," she said. different breed of art- w. They have no re- for business owners, ty owners. It's disre- ul. You have to call it is, it's just disre-

e Motions is far from ly muralist to feel ly Baca's famed mural male Olympic runner ved, even though it en hit by taggers in the hen in 2019, the mural t of the 1984 Olympics vement — was mys- ly whitewashed, ing outrage. Metro ally admitted one of affiti abatement con- rs had covered the and vowed to restore ey would rather paint mural than see even a mark of graffiti on the mural," Baca said at the time.

The latest vandalism to Bryant's mural felt like another blow to the area.

A post on June 3 from the DTLA Insider Instagram account summed up the situation simply: "We really can't have nice things."

The mural image is a spin on a photograph capturing a sweet moment during the 2008 NBA Finals when the Lakers legend — a proud "girl dad" — leans down and kisses the side of his smiling toddler's head as he cradles her in his arm during a news conference.

Sloe Motions was drawn to the emotion in the photograph — the purity of a father's love and a daughter's admiration for her hero. It was captured years before Gigi started playing basketball, showing off her own version of her dad's envied fade-away jumper.

Next to them, the words "Mambas Forever" with an infinity symbol are painted in purple and gold.

Bryant, 41, and 13-year-old Gigi, along with seven others — John Altobelli, 56; Keri Altobelli, 46; Alyssa Altobelli, 13; Christina Mauser, 38, Sarah Chester, 45; Payton Chester, 13; and pilot Ara Zobayan, 50 — died Jan. 26, 2020, when the helicopter Zobayan was flying crashed in the hills of Calabasas.

After the initial vandalism in late March, Sloe Motions had sought donations to help cover the cost of restoring the mural in the current location, hoping to preserve the spot for the Bryant family.

"There's just a lot of meaning at that wall," he said.

Lakers star Luka Dončić's foundation quickly jumped into action, donating $5,000, the full amount needed, to a fundraiser to help restore the art piece.

In late May, Sloe Motions posted on Instagram that the mural was finally finished. He'd added a few additional touches, painting the No. 8 on Gigi's jersey, an homage to the number that Kobe wore for the first 10 seasons of his career.

A week later, the new details were still visible but under the scrawl of white paint.

On June 4, television news cameras were positioned near the mural, and passersby stopped to assess the damage. A jumble of bright white paint cut across the image, and heavy white dots covered Kobe's and Gigi's eyes.

"This time, they really went heavy," Sergio Bautista, 35, said as he stood in front of the mural. "It's sad to see."

Sky Hendrix, who was in the area filming a music video with a friend, expressed his disbelief.

"That's disrespecting the dead," Hendrix said as he took in the scene. "Who would do that? He's the GOAT and she's just a little girl."

Despite the vandalism, Sloe Motions showed no real sign of anger as he talked about the future of the art piece somewhere else where more people could view and appreciate it.

He said he sent "prayers" to the people who vandalized his work.

"Nothing's forever, and that's the beauty of this stuff," Sloe Motions said. "Some stuff could last a minute, some stuff could last a day, some stuff could last years."

Times photographer Genaro Molina contributed to this report.

Analysis finds a major boost in aquifers. Stormwater capture, other efforts are cited.

By IAN JAMES

A year of average precipitation gave California's groundwater supplies a significant boost, according to a state analysis released Tuesday.

California's aquifers gained an estimated 2.2 million acre-feet of groundwater in the 12 months that ended Sept. 30, the state's 2024 water year. That's about half the storage capacity of Shasta Lake, California's largest reservoir.

State officials said local agencies reported that about 1.9 million acre-feet of water went underground as a result of managed aquifer recharge projects designed to capture stormwater and replenish groundwater.

The boost to underground supplies occurred

while the state is implementing water-saving programs and regulations intended to help curb chronic overpumping in farming areas in the Central Valley.

The amount of groundwater replenishment during the 2024 water year, while significant, was less than the 8.7 million acre-feet that percolated underground during the extremely wet 2023 water year, according to state estimates.

Even as California has sought to capture more stormwater to recharge groundwater, pumping to provide for agriculture has continued drawing on underground supplies.

The groundwater report, prepared by the state Department of Water Resources, said about 11.5 million acre-feet of groundwater was pumped across 98 basins, based on data from local agencies that submitted annual reports. That was up from 9.7 million reported the previous year.

The Central Valley accounted for more than 84% of groundwater extraction

TAYFUN COSKUN Anadolu

SNOW COVERS Highway 395 as a storm hits the Sierra Nevada in December.

statewide, and most of that water was used to supply the valley's farmlands.

Gov. Gavin Newsom said California is collecting more groundwater data than it has previously, and is continuing to prioritize efforts to recharge aquifers. He said, however, that the state's water infrastructure is unprepared for the effects of climate change, and he reiterated his support for building a water tunnel beneath the Sacramento-San Joaquin River Delta.

"We're done with barriers," Newsom said in a statement. "We must modernize our water infrastructure."

The proposed Delta Conveyance Project, with an estimated price tag of $20.1 billion, has generated heated debate. Supporters say the proposed project is essential to modernizing the state's water infrastructure and maintaining the reliability of supplies from the State Water Project. Opponents would unnecessarily harm the Delta's deteriorated ecosystem, threaten species and lead to significantly higher water costs for the public.

As they released the figures, officials said efforts to address groundwater overpumping have been helped by a state program called LandFlex, which has provided $23.3 million in grants to local groundwater agencies, enabling dozens of small and midsize farms to take steps to bolster groundwater levels.

According to state estimates, the program helped save more than 100,000 acre-feet of groundwater by reducing pumping. The Department of Water Resources said the program has also helped in reducing floodwaters onto low-lying farmland to recharge groundwater.

Department Director Karla Nemeth called "climate-resilient solutions" for local water management agencies as well as farm-ment to Orange County election officials, seeking information on people who had been removed from the county's voter rolls because they weren't eligible to vote. According to the lawsuit, federal officials were acting on a complaint made by the relative of a noncitizen who received a mail-in ballot.

Over a five-year period, Orange County identified 17 noncitizens who had registered to vote, Page told the federal agency in a June 16 letter, sent in response to the June 2 request. Those people either "self-reported" [See Noncitizens, A6]

Some Guardsmen and families are agonizing over the operations in L.A., advocates say.

BY HAILEY
BRANSON-POTTS
AND PHI DO

Ever since President Trump seized control of the California National Guard and deployed thousands of troops to Los Angeles, calls from distressed service members and their families have been pouring in to the GI Rights Hotline.

CARLIN STIEHL Los Angeles Times

A MARINE stands guard outside the Wilshire Federal Building in Los Angeles on Monday.

Some National Guard troops and their loved ones have called to say they were agonizing over the legality of the deployment, which is being litigated in federal court, according to Steve Woolford, a resource counselor for the hotline, which provides confidential counseling for service members.

Others phoned in to say the Guard should play no part in federal immigration raids and that they worried about immigrant family members who might get swept up.

"They don't want to deport their uncle or their wife [See Troops, A7] ported 15 cases; Ohio and Illinois, 10, and Arkansas and Indiana, eight.

The virus is spreading almost universally among people who either haven't been vaccinated, or whose vaccination status is not known, authorities note. But the MMR shots, so named because they also afford protection against mumps and rubella, have long been in the crosshairs of anti-vaccine activists and skeptics — some of whom are now in charge of shaping U.S. policy regarding childhood immunizations.

There have been 17 cases [See Measles, A14]

CAROLYN COLE Los Angeles Times

ARTIST Sloe Motions in front of his mural of Kobe Bryant, left, and Snoop Dogg.

Graffiti mars Kobe tribute

Just days after being restored, a mural of the Lakers legend and his daughter Gianna was tagged again

BY HANNAH FRY
AND NATHAN SOLIS

Weathered and bumpy, the wall hidden among the surplus clothing stores of the Fashion District was hardly the perfect canvas.

But artist Sloe Motions' vision for the memorial mural in honor of Kobe Bryant and his daughter Gianna following their deaths in 2020 brought the stretch of Main and 14th streets to life with vibrant hues of purple and gold.

One of the most well-known Kobe murals across Southern California, the art piece — outside Jimmy Jam T-Shirts — was the backdrop for a commercial for Super Bowl LVI featuring Vanessa Bryant and has drawn fans from near and far.

For years, the mural remained untouched — an unspoken mark of respect for the artist and the subject but one that abruptly ended this year.

In late March, someone tagged the artwork with large bubble letters outlined in black and filled in with white — a similar style to other street tagging visible across the city.

Sloe Motions went back to work, painstakingly restoring the mural. There was much fanfare in downtown when the new mural made its debut in late May. But [See Kobe, A8]

Justices rule Medicaid can exclude Planned Parenthood

BY DAVID G. SAVAGE

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court ruled Thursday that states may exclude Planned Parenthood clinics from providing medical screenings and other healthcare for women on Medicaid.

The court's conservative majority cast aside the long-standing rule that said Medicaid patients may obtain medical care from any qualified provider.

In a 6-3 vote, the justices ruled the Medicaid Act does not give patients an "individual right" to the provider of their choice.

The dispute turned on abortion, even though federal funds cannot be used for the procedure.

Medicaid is funded by the federal government and the states. For decades, conservative states have sought to "defund" Planned Parenthood and argued they did not want to subsidize a leading provider of abortions.

But until recently, the federal government and most courts had held that Medicaid patients may go to any qualified provider for healthcare.

The legal battle hinged on whether the Medicaid Act gave patients a right that could be protected in court. The answer was no, said Justice Neil M. Gorsuch, speaking for the majority. [See Justices, A7]

CalGuard crews at 40% capacity

Newsom says crucial firefighting units have been diverted to L.A. for federal immigration actions. CALIFORNIA, B1

Price at the pump to rise in summer

California's sales tax on gasoline and the Low Carbon Fuel Standard program will take effect in July. BUSINESS, A11

Weather

Mostly sunny.
L.A. Basin: 83/62. B6

JASON ARMOND Los Angeles Times

FEAR FOR FEAR'S SAKE

A tenuous ceasefire between Iran and Israel is allowing President Trump to exploit Americans' anxiety, Anita Chabria writes. PERSPECTIVES, A2

In a city of murals, Kobe tribute is tagged

[Kobe, from A1]
within a few days, it was again defaced. The artist is disappointed but vows to restore it once again — this time in a new location.

"This one has a lot of meaning to it, so it hurts me that people would do something like this where they're disrespecting the Bryant family. It just exposes these people's demons," Sloe Motions said.

Residents of downtown are used to tags as part of the landscape. This is, after all, the place where taggers coated the unfinished Oceanwide Plaza high-rise complex with graffiti, generating international attention and debate about the line between art and vandalism.

But the treatment of the Kobe tribute surprised Sloe Motions.

"This isn't just another Kobe mural. It's a memorial," he said.

Street art has long been a part of the culture of Los Angeles, where murals — sanctioned and unsanctioned — and graffiti harmoniously share canvas space. Some abide by the unwritten code that you don't cover someone else's art. Others take a more autonomous approach, creating what they want where they want.

"Great cities have great public art," said Wyland, a Laguna Beach-based artist who has painted murals across the world. "This Kobe mural, it's become part of the fabric of Los Angeles. And for someone to come in and destroy it like that doesn't make any sense."

Los Angeles is known as a city of murals — some of which remain respectfully untouched for years, while others like the Kobe memorial are a seemingly irresistible target for taggers. There was a time when some property owners believed hiring the right muralist to grace your walls — or including a portrait of the Virgen de Guadalupe — could keep taggers away. But not anymore.

In many ways downtown Los Angeles is the perfect gallery for viewing street art, turning nondescript buildings into colorful canvases that tell the story of the region.

Ife Ewing, co-owner of Jimmy Jam T-Shirts, says street art has changed in the

A MEMORIAL to Kobe and Gigi Bryant in L.A. was vandalized twice. "There's just a lot of meaning at that wall," artist Sloe Motions said.

13 years her business has been housed on Main Street. "Before, it was isolated to designated areas," she said. "It's a different breed of artists now. They have no respect for business owners, property owners. It's disrespectful. You have to call it what it is, it's just disrespect."

Sloe Motions is far from the only muralist to feel burned. Judy Baca's famed mural of a female Olympic runner is beloved, even though it has been hit by taggers in the past. Then in 2019, the mural — part of the 1984 Olympics art movement — was mysteriously whitewashed, sparking outrage. Metro eventually admitted one of its graffiti abatement contractors had covered the mural and vowed to restore it.

"They would rather paint on the mural than see even a mark of graffiti on the mural," Baca said at the time. The latest vandalism to Bryant's mural felt like another blow to the area. A post on June 3 from the DTLA Insider Instagram account summed up the situation simply: "We really can't have nice things."

The mural image is a spin on a photograph capturing a sweet moment during the 2008 NBA Finals when the Lakers legend — a proud "girl dad" — leans down and kisses the side of his smiling toddler's head as he cradles her in his arm during a news conference.

Sloe Motions was drawn to the emotion in the photograph — the purity of a father's love and a daughter's admiration for her hero. It was captured years before Gigi started playing basketball, showing off her own version of her dad's envied fade-away jumper.

Next to them, the words "Mambas Forever" with an infinity symbol are painted in purple and gold.

Bryant, 41, and 13-year-old Gigi, along with seven others — John Altobelli, 56; Keri Altobelli, 46; Alyssa Altobelli, 13; Christina Mauser, 38, Sarah Chester, 45; Payton Chester, 13; and pilot Ara Zobayan, 50 — died Jan. 26, 2020, when the helicopter Zobayan was flying crashed in the hills of Calabasas.

After the initial vandalism in late March, Sloe Motions had sought donations to help cover the cost of restoring the mural in the current location, hoping to preserve the spot for the Bryant family.

"There's just a lot of meaning at that wall," he said. Lakers star Luka Dončić's foundation quickly jumped into action, donating $5,000, the full amount needed, to a fundraiser to help restore the art piece. In late May, Sloe Motions posted on Instagram that the mural was finally finished. He'd added a few additional touches, painting the No. 8 on Gigi's jersey, an homage to the number that Kobe wore for the first 10 seasons of his career.

A week later, the new details were still visible but under the scrawl of white paint. On June 4, television news cameras were positioned near the mural, and passersby stopped to assess the damage. A jumble of bright white paint cut across the image, and heavy white dots covered Kobe's and Gigi's eyes.

"This time, they really went heavy," Sergio Bautista, 35, said as he stood in front of the mural. "It's sad to see."

Sky Hendrix, who was in the area filming a music video with a friend, expressed his disbelief. "That's disrespecting the dead," Hendrix said as he took in the scene. "Who would do that? He's the GOAT and she's just a little girl."

Despite the vandalism, Sloe Motions showed no real sign of anger as he talked about the future of the art piece somewhere else where more people could view and appreciate it.

He said he sent "prayers" to the people who vandalized his work. "Nothing's forever, and that's the beauty of this stuff," Sloe Motions said. "Some stuff could last a minute, some stuff could last a day, some stuff could last years."

Times photographer Genaro Molina contributed to this report.

CLIMATE

A refreshing year for state

Analysis finds a major boost in aquifers. Stormwater capture, other efforts are cited.

BY IAN JAMES

A year of average precipitation gave California's groundwater supplies a significant boost, according to a state analysis released Tuesday.

California's aquifers gained an estimated 2.2 million acre-feet of groundwater in the 12 months that ended Sept. 30, the state's 2024 water year. That's about half the storage capacity of Shasta Lake, California's largest reservoir.

State officials said local agencies reported that about 1.9 million acre-feet of water went underground as a result of managed aquifer recharge projects designed to capture stormwater and replenish groundwater.

The boost to underground supplies occurred

while the state is implementing water-saving programs and regulations intended to help curb chronic overpumping in farming areas in the Central Valley.

The amount of groundwater replenishment during the 2024 water year, while significant, was less than the 8.7 million acre-feet that percolated underground during the extremely wet 2023 water year, according to state estimates.

Even as California has sought to capture more stormwater to recharge groundwater, pumping to provide for agriculture has continued drawing on underground supplies.

The groundwater report, prepared by the state Department of Water Resources, said about 11.5 million acre-feet of groundwater was pumped across 98 basins, based on data from local agencies that submitted annual reports. That was up from 9.7 million reported the previous year.

The Central Valley accounted for more than 84% of groundwater extraction

SNOW COVERS Highway 395 as a

statewide, and most of that water was used to supply the valley's farmlands.

Gov. Gavin Newsom said California is collecting more groundwater data than it has previously, and is continuing to prioritize efforts to recharge aquifers. He said, however, that the state's is unpr of clim iterate buildin neath Joaqui "We ers," N ment.

